NFL, Louisiana attorney general settle 'Who Dat' misunderstanding

BATON ROUGE, La. -- Louisiana's attorney general said Monday that shops can sell T-shirts with the phrase "Who Dat" the fleur-de-lis symbol if they don't make other references to the New Orleans Saints or the National Football League.

Attorney General Buddy Caldwell said he had a conference call with the NFL's general counsel to discuss cease-and-desist letters that some Louisiana T-shirt makers received from the league. The letters demanded that the businesses stop selling shirts featuring the phrase that's part of a popular cheer by Saints fans, citing trademark infringement.

"They've conceded and they've said they have no intention of claiming the fleur-de-lis, which would be ridiculous, or 'Who Dat,' which would be equally ridiculous," Caldwell said.

The NFL is only objecting to shirts that are marketed or presented as an official Saints or NFL product, Caldwell said. Shirts that are black and gold and say "Who Dat" can be sold, he said, if they don't purport to be Saints gear and don't include the team logo.

The chant -- "Who dat say dey gonna beat dem Saints" -- is often shortened to "Who Dat" on shirts and signs and has been a mainstay at the Superdome in New Orleans since the 1980s.

"People can use Who Dat all they want if it doesn't include NFL and Saints trademarks," NFL spokesman Brian McCarthy said in an e-mail. "We explained that we would contact merchants only if a Who Dat item also contained NFL or Saints trademarks or if it is falsely claimed that an unauthorized item is affiliated with the Saints or NFL."

The "Who Dat" spat has outraged many Louisiana residents and merchants, who argued the NFL couldn't claim ownership of a saying or symbol that predates the Saints, who will make their first Super Bowl appearance Sunday against the Indianapolis Colts. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal asked Caldwell to look into a possible lawsuit if the NFL was attempting to declare ownership rights of the phrase.

Lauren Thom, owner of the Fleurty Girl T-shirt shop in New Orleans, said she has changed the product description on "Who Dat" shirts after receiving a letter from the NFL demanding that she quit selling them. She's sold out of her stock and is managing back orders.

"Yes, it disrupted business, but it's been kind of great as well," Thom said. "We've had lines of people waiting to buy merchandise. One lady told me she wanted to buy anything in the store that was not NFL-licensed. I told her, 'That's the store!'"

"What started out as a letter that scared the bejesus out of me has turned out to be the best thing ever for my business," Thom said.
